As a rule clouds are the reservoirs rom which rain falls, but rain has in some cases rain reaches the earth's surface from clouds removed several degrees from the zenith." The path of a rain-drop often makes an angle with the vertical even greater than 45 degrees and rain might therefore reach the earth from a cloud removed 20 or 30 degrees o even more from the zenith, especially if there prevailed near the earth's surface a fresh breeze blowing in a different direction from the current that conveys the cloud." The above explanation applies to cases where only the sky immediately overhead is clear. He goes further and in reference to the fall of rain from an apparently cloudless sky, when no clouds can be seen above the horizon; markable rainfalls, although the sky not entirely from haziness, which is indeed nothing else than a cloud so thin as to allow the brighter star to shine through it. The partial transparency of such a cloud may be due to the small number and large
